> P.S. And, please, in the future give poor Robert a couple > more days to bask in the glory before peppering him > with suggestions. You have no idea how intimidating it is > to see your e-mail piling up with immediate suggestions > for how the code you sweated over for days can be > improved. It doesn't help, of course, (I speak from > experience here) that most of the suggestions are for > improvements that (in retrospect) should have been > completely obvious to any thinking person writing > the code in the first place. :-(
>
>
My apologies, Robert! In my enthusiasm for the possibilities of changing your routine, I was not intending to be critical of what you have done. I'm still a hunter-gatherer - I hunt for code that does more or less what I want, and gather bits and pieces of it together. I may take a year or too for me to move up the ladder to 'expert'. Thanks again for your hard work!
Dick