Craig again hit the nail on the head. This whole idea of saving to files which name is defined at runtime percludes further use of these files from inside a program. They can only be used by the operator, because there is no way to tell the code what file names are, and moreover, what are variable names going to be once those files are restored. I ran into this before, and found out that there always is a better way to organize the data.
