Subject: Re: IDL License Manager in Linux
Posted by R.Bauer on Sat, 14 May 2005 11:49:18 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Oops

this was to similiar to my own request sorry for the confusion

Reimar

Reimar Bauer wrote:

> Michael Wallace wrote:
>
>>> I'm running IDL on suse linux. Right now, I have my /etc/init.d/>>> scripts set up to shut down the IDL license manager when I shutdown the >>> computer (ie. I have a script in /etc/init.d/rc0.d/). ...Is there any >>> reason to shut >>> down the license manager? It seems to me it is pointless, and it ends >>> up making my computer take a long time to shut down!
>>
>> I have the license manager (on Fedora Linux) set up to run at boot and >> at shutdown and it only takes a couple seconds either to bring it up or >> shut it down. I know that doesn't help you, but try looking in the logs >> and see if you can spot anything strange. Does the same thing happen >> when you shutdown the manager manually rather than at the time the >> machine shuts down?
>>
>> -Mike
>
> Did you have a static or dynamical IP-Address. I think I have setup it > nearly the same as you. It loads as runlevel script during bootup. It > works perfect if I use a static IP-Address connected or not connected but > always if I have to use a dynamical address and I am not connected to the > network it does not start. (I missed to decribe this point in my request > right) This is not a new behaviour I have recogniced this since SuSE8.0 > but now dhcp is more important for us and it is difficult sometimes to > remember why it goes right in the office but not on a conference.
> I think if dhcp request fails the system decides not to start anything > later dependend on this. I will look where and how this happens.
>
> cheers
> Reimar