
Subject: Re: How 2 access to ubuntu in my office
Posted by d.poreh on Tue, 13 Dec 2011 18:32:21 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

On Dec 13, 2:35 am, Nigel Wade <nmw-n...@ion.le.ac.uk> wrote:

> On 12/12/11 09:48, DavePoreh wrote:

>

>> On Dec 11, 10:06 pm, Matt Francis<mattjamesfran...@gmail.com> wrote:

>>> If you don't need an X display then PuTTY

(<http://www.chiark.greenend.org.uk/~sgtatham/putty/>) is a free and relatively >>> easy to use option for Windows. From memory Ubuntu I think >>> installations by default don't have an ssh server installed. This is a >>> help page for a slightly older Ubuntu install than the most up to >>> date, but it should all still be correcthttps://help.ubuntu.com/10.04/serverguide/C/openssh-s erver.html

>

>>> There may be some trickiness getting into your office machine though, >>> depending on what security is in place at your workplace.

>

>> thanks Matt. Putty is working just fine.

>> Cheers,

>> Dave

>

> If you want to see graphical output, e.g. from IDL, then you will need > an X server. We use NX here (which would be free for you to install on > your home system), and vastly preferable to non-optimized X servers such > as eXceed due to the inbuilt compression of the X protocol which NX > provides.

>

> However, I would not recommend using the full desktop over a home > network connection. I don't know Ubuntu so don't know what alternative > desktops it provides. We use openSUSE, and most users prefer the > reasonably lightweight XFCE desktop for remote sessions.

Thanks. i tried NX but when i put my IP (destination) it shows me connection error. lets see what is wrong.

Cheers,

Dave
