On Thursday, February 28, 2013 2:00:12 PM UTC, David Fanning wrote:
> I didn't realize there were still people not using the Workbench or > EMACS.

To each their own. I had a well-configured emacs back in the day, all emacs-lisp inherited from knowledgeable people long before I had even heard of Lisp. Then a series of backward-incompatible changes happened to emacs, and after I had to rebuild my config from scratch (and not understanding an iota of what happened) for the third time, I decided emacs took too much time away from my coursework. I went to vi and never looked back. At least it can never be configured so far that you have no idea where you are.

... and even my emacs-wielding colleagues found BP to be useful.

Have you taught your emacs to find the correct inherited method in a deep and branched inheritance tree?

> I should have guessed the cold, frozen North in Tromso! Still > dark there, this time of year? ;-)

http://www.timeanddate.com/worldclock/astronomy.html?n=290

> David Fanning, Ph.D.

--T