Usually this group is deep into vectorization, optimization, and so on... except for David's occasional asides on tennis. However, does anybody have any interesting/funny/random/ IDL code that makes your programs more enjoyable to use? As a VERY simple example:

function stupid_error_message output=['I do not like you', $
'This program has many bugs, stop whining!', $
'Are you an idiot?', $
'Why did you do that?', $
'Please stop crashing the program!']
return, output[fix(randomu(seed)*5)]
end

The output array is sanitized for general consumption, usually I'm a bit more explicit...but you get the idea. I like the option of generating random insults when users cause my stuff to break, though typically it's my fault.

Take care,
frank

Well, I never could keep those guys straight. It's the price you pay for going without television all those years. :-)

Cheers,

I bought some 3 Stooges DVDS's for my girls. They roll around laughing their butts off.

There's just nothing like the Stooges these days - it's all anime-style cartoon garbage with precious little humour at any level.
